The ones in the diagram are the "official" tunnels that run from the lower levels of the office buildings to the lower level of the capital.

Once you reach a certain level of power you always have a way out that isn't the public facing one. The problem only comes in when the plebs find out about them and it only takes one entrance to be able to figure out the rest.

There is a bunker in West Virginia built under a hotel, Greenbrier I think is the name. It was built during the cold war. It is huge, big enough for congress and their families. It was decommissioned several years ago. They must have a REALLY nice bunker now. <https://m.youtube.com/watch?v=g3kAcJruEOs>

No matter how nice a bunker is, it has to have air exchanges. Those don't work well when exposed to large amounts of concrete.

Most of the connected buildings in the diagram are the congressional office buildings where the members have their offices. The tunnels are accessed at that end by elevator and stairwells located just past the lobby security checkpoints. The stairs have little security beyond the checkpoint themselves, and can be accessed by walking down.

Lobby checkpoint is manned by ~ 3 cops on a regular day and is just a metal detector and reception desk basically. Count on there being more on a day like this though.

While the stairs aren't heavily secured, both ends of the tunnels that I've been in have Cheyenne Mountain-tier blast doors at both ends that could be closed.

The tunnels are mostly pedestrian traffic made up of congressional staff, there could be golf carts and trams in there though, the ones I've been in were wide enough for 2 lanes of cars.

Some imagery is available: <https://duckduckgo.com/?q=house+office+building+tunnel&iax=images&ia=images>

A lot of these are out of date though.

Absolutely! There's an extensive underground network that connects DC and the surrounding areas, thanks to the Metro. I've always assumed for every part of a Metro station that I can see, there's a covert section that's accessible to the politicians.

Anyone going armed needs to be mentally prepared to draw down on LEOs. Let them shoot first, but make sure they know what happens if they do.
